

Bill Clinton urges transparency in AIDS funding

July 27 2012, by Kerry Sheridan

---

Former US president Bill Clinton on Friday said donors will continue to fund the response to the world AIDS crisis despite global financial woes and urged greater transparency by all involved.

Clinton, who works to provide low-cost HIV medications to foreign nations through his Clinton Foundation, spoke at the closing ceremony of the 19th International AIDS Conference in the US capital.

"If we all keep producing results I believe the money will be there. And I am committed to doing whatever I can to see that it does. We do have to prove over and over again that we are making the most of the money," he said.

Clinton highlighted the 16.8 billion dollars spent worldwide last year on the three-decade-old pandemic, remarking that for the first time funding by individual nations exceeded foreign assistance.

He also noted progress in bringing down the cost of treating people with HIV worldwide, which was about $1,000 per year per person in 2003 according to UNAIDS but is now about $200 per person annually.

But he also called for changes to the system, saying that money could be spent more effectively and should not be influenced by political interests.

"We can target the money we are spending more effectively," Clinton told the gathering of 24,000 scientists, advocates and policy makers.

"This may be somewhat controversial but I feel strongly about it. We need a new level of openness about how every last dollar is spent -- by countries, by donors, by NGOs," he said.

"You can't expect program managers all over the world to make the smartest decisions if they are trapped in a financial black box," he added.

"Not so somebody can be embarrassed, but so we can see who is doing better and the rest of us can copy."

Clinton acknowledged the conference was being held in the US capital where an epidemic is raging -- particularly among the city's black residents -- that is comparable to some hard-hit countries in Africa.

The former Arkansas governor also said the AIDS crisis was particularly acute in the US south.

"I'm sad to say since it is my home region that there is still too much stigma," Clinton said.

"It is embarrassing for me to think stigma against people with HIV exists anywhere in America."

Clinton called for investments to be "based on evidence, not the politics and vested interests that too often drive spending decisions."

Earlier this week Secretary of State Hillary Clinton pledged new US funding for HIV/AIDS and told the meeting the United States is committed to the notion that an "AIDS-free generation" can be achieved.

UNAIDS said earlier this month that global spending on AIDS rose 11 percent from 2010 to 2011, helping another 1.4 million poor people on AIDS drugs, bringing the tally to a record of more than eight million, or 54 percent of those in need.

But there was a funding gap of $7 billion, half of it in sub-Saharan Africa, home to 69 percent of the 34 million people living with HIV.

Spending by the United States and other Western countries, together with philanthropists and agencies such as the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, TB and Malaria has remained almost unchanged since Western economies were hit by the financial crisis in 2008.

(c) 2012 AFP

Citation: Bill Clinton urges transparency in AIDS funding (2012, July 27) retrieved 4 July 2023 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2012-07-bill-clinton-urges-transparency-aids.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.