

Indigenous health leaders aim to tackle long-standing health inequalities

March 12 2018, by Kathryn Powley

Twelve Indigenous health leaders are embarking on a bold and innovative leadership program through the Melbourne Poche Centre for Indigenous Health at The University of Melbourne to tackle some of Australia's long-term health problems.

"Indigenous Australians have a great depth of strength and resilience, whilst at the same time being over-represented in most measurable health outcomes," said Melbourne Poche Centre director Professor Shaun Ewen.

The Poche Leadership Fellows Program aims to help emerging Indigenous health leaders influence change across Australia.

The program will boost participants' leadership potential and broaden their networks through two Melbourne-based modules, in March and November, and a week-long program of visits and meetings in London in May.

The group will travel to Kings College, London, for a program designed to build on their leadership networks, skills and opportunities in an international context. They will join discussions at the Australian High Commission, Rhodes House in Oxford and Westminster Palace in the Houses of Parliament.

Professor Ewen said: "The vision of our most generous donors, Greg and Kay Poche, was that their gift would be transformational. We expect that by supporting the emerging generation of Indigenous leaders in health, we are able to contribute to the transformation of policy, research, clinical care and health systems in general, such that the playing field between Indigenous and other Australians is level."

The early-career fellows have been chosen from a range of backgrounds and include nurses, doctors and a lawyer. The majority of participants are in the process of completing their doctoral studies. Their interests include research, policy and clinical practice in higher education institutions, government and the health service delivery sector.

Provided by University of Melbourne

Citation: Indigenous health leaders aim to tackle long-standing health inequalities (2018, March 12) retrieved 19 January 2023 from <https://medicalxpress.com/news/2018-03-indigenous-health-leaders-aim-tackle.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.